LEGALITIES

To marry legally in Thailand you must complete an affidavit at the embassy of your nationality, for your convenience, we are able to forward details of your country's embassy in the Kingdom

EMBASSY DOCUMENTATION

Documentation required by your embassy may vary, however the most common documentation required are;

- Completed statutory declaration with the vice consul to witness your signature
- Birth Certificate
- Certificate of divorce if previously married
- Proof of identity with your passport
- Please note that embassy administration costs vary from country to country

DOCUMENTATION PROCESS

- Once the documentation is completed, you will need to have the statutory declaration translated in Thai.
- If one of the parties or both has been married before, you must have your original divorce certificate or the original death certificate translated into Thai.
- This can be done by translation service, once the documents are translated they must be authenticated by the Legislation Division of ministry of Foreign Affairs in Bangkok.
- A good translation service will actually help with this stage as you will need a good interpreter as the officials of government offices do not speak fluent English
- This entire process will take three or more working days to complete
- Once the above is completed, you will need to go to the Civil Registry Office (Amphur)
- Or we will arrange for the Civil Registry Office (Amphur) Official to be presented at your ceremony to register the marriage.
- All above documents are needed and advance appointment must be made.
- They will present you with your marriage certificate (in Thai)
- After you have signed the certificate, you are officially married as required by Thai Law
- Buddhist weddings are symbolic in nature. If you would like your marriage to be legalized in Thailand we recommended that you contact your embassy for the correct procedures and documentation required.
- Our wedding planner can advise and assist you further on the registration procedure and forward the necessary contact details.

Sincerely Yours,

Wedding Planner Team
